

BARRIE'S GUEST

By JACK LAWTON.

(© 1921, Western Newspaper Union.)

For days Barrie had ridden the lonely trail obsessed by a hunger for companionship which he had never heretofore known. Even the gruff, illiterate guide, whom he had left far below, would now be welcome. And as Barrie traveled his lonely paths, he wondered if the clue which led him to this desolate spot might not be false after all. In a spirit of enthusiastic confidence he had offered his service in seeking out the supposed defaulter of the bank, in which his own father was president.

Defectives, it was proven, had been at sea in their suspicions, and Barrie, in a moment of inspiration, had put his finger mentally upon the culprit, and then had offered to take an adventurous trip to the far mountains, where Glen Gordon was supposed to be hiding.

Glen Gordon had served faithfully for many years in the bank where Barrie, under his father, was employed. And when Glen Gordon's name was furnishing the sensation of city dailies, Gordon himself completely disappeared.

As Barrie's father—in his last hope of proving his old employee's honesty—had provided necessary bail, the flight was more distressing. But now Barrie feared that the clue, given by an old servant of the Gordon's, had been misleading, and his own offered service useless.

Then, far above in a clearing, the young man beheld a small cabin; smoke came from its chimney, and Barrie eagerly pressed his horse forward. The slight of human habitation was at least comforting. And as he approached, a young woman turned. At sight of her, Barrie's eyes reflected the astonishment of her own.

Barrie broke the silence. "Beg pardon," he said. "I have traveled far, without finding a resting place. May I rest here? And, perhaps, trespass further upon your hospitality in asking for food? A glass of milk or a piece of bread would be gratefully received."

When she reappeared at the door of the cabin bearing a light table, Barrie hastened to relieve her, carrying it at the girl's direction to the shelter of a tree. Sharpness was still in the air, and he would have preferred indoors. But when his enforced hostess came presently, she carried a basket of cakes and cracker-sandwiches and a pot of steaming tea. And as she served him, Barrie noted the soft whiteness of her hands.

"It is unusually good fortune to enjoy the hospitality of one of my own country women in such a desolate place," he said.

The girl, with an enigmatical smile, ignored the suggested question.

"When you feel refreshed you will kindly ride on your way," she returned.

"I'm afraid," Barrie said decidedly, "that before I do so I must gain that information for which I came. I am trying to locate a Mr. Glen Gordon, being the bearer of news to his advantage."

Though the girl's face paled, her blue eyes regarded steadily the self-imposed detective.

"Mr. Gordon is not here," she replied. "You may search the cabin, if you wish. I occupy it alone."

Barrie stared, then laughed incredulously.

"Alone in this wilderness?" he exclaimed. "Now, why do you do that?"

The girl gathered up the tea cups. "I have answered you," she said. "You are the first living person whom I heard speak in two months."

Over her shoulder she nodded to him. "Good night," she said meaningly.

Barrie did not search the cabin; but when he was again upon a lower level he looked up at the house in the clearing, and he saw the girl wave white cloth, giving with it three distinct signals. Then Barrie saw a man's tall figure—so the girl had lied, as he suspected.

He rode on to intercept the man, and as the man came Barrie recognized the one for whom he sought—Glen Gordon, trapped and frightened. The older man's chastely face turned crimson as the young one, alighting, clasped his hands as the hands of a friend.

"It's all right," Gordon realized the young man's words at last—"I came to tell you that we are aware of your innocence. I was lucky enough to hit upon the guilty devil, and he confessed—Hains, your assistant. But look here, man; why did you run away? You must have known that it would come out right!"

Inarticulate, tears rolling down his cheeks, Glen Gordon stood. Then he drew a paper from his pocket and wrote:

"It was nerve shock; lost my power of speech; wanted to run away from the papers—the suspicion—everything. And Julie came with me—Julie, my daughter. She was bound they wouldn't find me to take me back. So I've camped on the ground, in the thick of the brush. But she said the truth would come out, and it has. Barrie, my boy, come with me up to the cabin—to Julie. We will all go back together."

And as Barrie led the old man on toward where a girlish figure waited in the sunlight, he was thinking not of the success of his quest, but of the light that it was his to bring to a girl's brave blue eyes.
